POLITENESS COSTS YOU NOTHING - IT PAYS

WE of today have the matchless joy of being the inheritors of the glories of our ancient civilization, of our ancient culture and our very ways of life. These are all peculiar to us of INDIA. Our Mythologies and the histories of our people are over-flowing with evidence of the qualities of good manners, courtesy and respect for our elders, our Gurus, our women and so on. These are all noble qualities latent in us all, developed in some fully and in others not so fully. Alas. today there are visible signs of these qualities falling off in their standards in some of us. Why?

Since Independence we have been talking of our culture - please permit me to say this - ad nauseum. We seem to live on the glories of the past. Let us all search hearts truthfully and see if we are living upto the legacy left us, in this respect. Are we all, young and old, really keeping up our traditional qualities of good manners and politeness, both in our words and in our deeds? To me the reason for this laxity seems to be due to the wrong interpretations of the full meanings of Democracy, of Nationalism and of Independance, which has given to some, the licence to ignore the practising in their daily lives, these inexpensive but most valuable "commodities". To such people, anyone who is punctilious in the observance of the rules of society in regard to good manners and politeness is a Westerner. Why, I just cannot understand. Is it the feeling of such people that good manners and politeness are the monopoly of Westerners?

To me, every INDIAN, man and woman, is a gentleman - is a lady, NOT by mere high birth but because they are INDIANS. It is in their blood to be so. As I have said earlier on the qualities of these are inherent in us but they have to be developed and kept up always to bring greater glory and prestige to our country. "Manners maketh a man" and such men "maketh" a great Nation. The expressions "What a perfect gentleman! - What a perfect lady!" are pregnant with eulogies for one so addressed for his or her uprightness of character, of godliness of soul, of good manners, of politeness and courtesy. It is within the reach of every one of us to be so eulogised if we want to, and I say, we MUST, to make our Nation greater than it is today.

Our codes of manners and customs in our society have not been unaffected by the impact of Western tradition. I do not for one split second champion the cause of ultra-conservatives who refuse to accept anything new, which might help improve our own ideas, because they wish to preserve their own for ever. This is not right. We must move with the times in this rapidly changing patters of society but in this we should not be slavish apes. Let us make the acceptance of new ideas a genuine synthesis to improve our own indigenous conduct in society.

The words, please, sorry and thank you, do not seem to be in the vocabulary of a good many of us today. These words cost us NOTHING to use, but their use on proper occasions, pays high dividends to win the respect of fellow human beings. Some of us are getting a little too slap-dash, rough and rude and abrupt in our behaviour in public. A busy salesman behind the counter in a shop, or an official occupied with some other work, or an usually harrassed telephone operator at the exchange would not fail to extend prompt and efficient service to one if they find that you are a considerate and polite person who does not get irritated and abusive through impatience. Politeness and consideration for others always pays.

When we talk to each other in company, some of us do talk in an unnecessarily loud voice. Very many of us are not good listeners. We all yabber away at the same time. Some like their own voice and monopolise conversation and become verbal bores. The art of gentle conversation seems to be a thing of the past. Washing dirty linen in publis is not uncommon. A gentleman or a lady does not speak ill of other persons unless they are certain of facts and figures and even if they are, they say to themselves, why speak. What better ways can you think of, to keep friends? It is rather embarrassing to hear people contradicting their elders and their seniors whilst discussing things

POLITENESS COSTS YOU NOTHING - IT PAYS

WE of today have the matchless joy of being the inheritors of the glories of our ancient civilization, of our ancient culture and our very ways of life. These are all peculiar to us of INDIA. Our Mythologies and the histories of our people are over-flowing with evidence of the qualities of good manners, courtesy and respect for our elders, our Gurus, our women and so on. These are all noble qualities latent in us all, developed in some fully and in others not so fully. Alas! today there are visible signs of these qualities falling off in their standards in some of us. Why?

Since Independence we have been talking of our culture - please permit me to say this - ad nauseum. We seem to live on the glories of the past. Let us all search hearts truthfully and see if we are living upto the legacy left us, in this respect. Are we all, young and old, really keeping up our traditional qualities of good manners and politeness, both in our words and in our deeds? To me the reason for this laxity seems to be due to the wrong interpretations of the full meanings of Democracy, of Nationalism and of Independance, which has given to some, the licence to ignore the practising in their daily lives, these inexpensive but most valuable "commodities". To such people, anyone who is punctilious in the observance of the rules of society in regard to good manners and politeness is a Westerner. Why, I just cannot understand. Is it the feeling of such people that good manners and politeness are the monopoly of Westerners?

To me, every INDIAN, man and woman, is a gentleman - is a lady, NOT by mere high birth but because they are INDIANS. It is in their blood to be so. As I have said earlier on the qualities of these are inherent in us but they have to be developed and kept up always to bring greater glory and prestige to our country. "Manners maketh a man" and such men "maketh" a great Nation. The expressions "What a perfect gentleman! - What a perfect lady!" are pregnant with euologies for one so addressed for his or her uprightness of character, of godliness of soul, of good manners, of politeness and courtesy. It is within the reach of every one of us to be so euologised if we want to, and I say, we MUST, to make our Nation greater than it is today.

Our codes of manners and customs in our society have not been unaffected by the impact of Western tradition. I do not for one split second champion the cause of ultra-conservatives who refuse to accept anything new, which might help improve our own ideas, because they wish to preserve their own for ever. This is not right. We must move with the times in this rapidly changing patters of society but in this we should not be slavish apes. Let us make the acceptance of new ideas a genuine synthesis to improve our own indigenous conduct in society.

The words, please, sorry and thank you, do not seem to be in the vocabulary of a good many of us today. These words cost us NOTHING to use, but their use on proper occasions, pays high dividends to win the respect of fellow human beings. Some of us are getting a little too slap-dash, rough and rude and abrupt in our behaviour in public. A busy salesman behind the counter in a shop, or an official occupied with some other work, or an usually harrassed telephone operator at the exchange would not fail to extend prompt and efficient service to one if they find that you are a considerate and polite person who does not get irritated and abusive through impatience. Politeness and consideration for others always pays.

When we talk to each other in company, some of us do talk in an unnecessarily loud voice. Very many of us are not good listeners. We all yabber away at the same time. Some like their own voice and monopolise conversation and become verbal bores. The art of gentle conversation seems to be a thing of the past. Washing dirty linen in publis is not uncommon. A gentleman or a lady does not speak ill of other persons unless they are certain of facts and figures and even if they are, they say to themselves, why speak. What better ways can you think of, to keep friends? It is rather embarrassing to hear people contradicting their elders and their seniors whilst discussing things in public. One can express one's disagreements politely and tactfully without being crude and rude.

I wonder, if watch making industry in India would be profitable, for what use are watches to some when they do not think it quite necessary to be on time for any function private or public - to whom the word punctuality is just a word? To such people, does it matter if the meals cooked for them is getting cold, if many other guests are waiting to meet them, if children are waiting in the sun or rain or cold, if the office staff want some urgent orders on time, if the audience are getting a little impatient by the inordinate delay in commencing a show and so on. To be punctual is act of discipline and consideration for others. Habitual unpunctuality is a social crime - unpardonable. If every one pays a fine of just, one naya paisa for being late, I feel sure we need have NO worries for money for our third five year plan. Let us have this fine. In mixed parties young people including women stood up whenever elders entered, as a mark of respect. Now this is a rare sight. Some of our young ladies are aping the West and do not get up at all because in Western Society a lady, young or old, is not expected to get up on such occasions. What a tragedy that our own charming young women are giving up our own delightful custom of such grace! Let us please keep up this custom. It was just not done for young people to smoke or sit cross-legged in the presence of one's parents particularly in the presence of one's father. How many keep this up now? One often hears young brats addressing their fathers with their hands in their pockets "Will you have a cigarette Dad?" - frightful!

A gentleman never makes a promise, which he cannot keep and if does make a promise, which he finds, he cannot keep he tells you in time, why he cannot. The worst thing a man can suffer in his public life, is to lose the faith and trust of his fellow beings. A gentleman would never have this, said about him by any one. "Do not believe a word he says - Don't trust him - Have you ever known him keep a promise?".

When one has enjoyed the hospitality of another, be it a stay with him, or taking a meal, it is customary to write to one's host a short note of thanks afterwards. How many of us have the courtesy to do this? It is good manners also to express one's gratitude, either in person or in writing, for any service or act of kindness from others and not take things for granted.

Arrogance, conceit and vulgar display of wealth and power are not the traits of gentlemen. Staying as a guest in the house of a friend, calls for good many acts of correctness on the part of the guest. Arrive on time, conform to the custom of the house in regard to the hours of meals. Dress correctly at all times. Do not accept outside invitations without first consulting your hosts - they may have laid on something for you in the house. How embarrassing it will be for the hosts who may have laid on large party for you and you tell them "I am dining out tonight with my old pal...."? In all these, there should be "May I please" and NOT "I will". I have had experience of this on numerous occasions. It is not done for a guest to discuss one's hosts with the servants of the house. Economy in the use of lights and water by guests in the rooms, they are staying, would be appreciated by their hosts. A word about tipping the servants. The hosts must first be asked if they would permit it, and if they do, give what you want to, to your host or direct to the servants, if the hosts request you to do so. When leaving the room it is but proper to leave it in a tidy state and not with bits of paper thrown about, beds not done up, towels and scraps of paper in the bath room lying about, having used the towels for cleaning one's shoes.

It is gentlemanly and ladylike to be correctly dressed at all times. Sad it is, that there is today laxity in this respect. Slovenly and untidy turnout in public does not command respect of others. One does not have to wear expensively tailored clothes to look smart. Whether one wears Western style or our own, it must be correct and complete and not half of one and half of the other.

A gentleman driving a car through crowded public thoroughfares, on dusty roads when passing houses or people, past schools and hospitals would automatically slow down. He would stop his car to let women, children, load carrying persons, animal drawn vehicles and old and disabled people, to have the right of way. This is consideration for others. He would not be road hog and [illegible] hang on to the middle of the road. He would pull up on the left of the road when he stops. It is the height of ill manners to remain seated in public conveyances, such as trams, buses and trains when women and elderly people are left standing for want of seats.

Our fore fathers maintained a certain tradition and a certain standard in their dealings with their fellow beings. They followed, as it were, a style of living, of which they were proud; Western influence has had some impact on all these. While one is free to imbibe influences whether of the West or of the East, one should not be purely imitative. It would be better if one's own genuine way of living is never wholly departed from, as otherwise one is neither fish nor fowl, nor good red herring. Slavish imitation is cheap whereas a genuine synthesis is a praiseworthy effort.

I learnt what little I know and practice in my life, from my dear parents and elders of old. Can we the elders of today with hands on our hearts say, that we are a model to our young people in respect of the subject of this talk - I am afraid not all of us can say it. This is our sacred duty to our children. We must bring them up by advice, by personal example and where necessary by firmness to be the gentlemen and ladies of our land. As Indians by birth they have the qualities of the latter, latent in them all, but they have to be developed. Who else can do this better than ones' parents and school teachers, with elders setting an example.

Many a young man with high academic and professional qualifications has had to step aside to make room for another with slightly lesser qualifications perhaps because the latter had a little more of politeness, good manners, courtesy than the former. Politeness paid this latter.

---

WE of today have the matchless joy of being the inheritors of the glories of our ancient civilization, of our ancient culture and our very ways of life. These are all peculiar to us of INDIA. Our Mythologies and the histories of our people are over-flowing with evidence of the qualities of good manners, courtesy and respect for our elders, our Gurus, our women and so on. These are all noble qualities latent in us all, developed in some fully and in others not so fully. Alas! today there are visible signs of these qualities falling off in their standards in some of us. Why?

Since Independence we have been talking of our culture - please permit me to say this - ad nauseum. We seem to live on the glories of the past. Let us all search hearts truthfully and see if we are living upto the legacy left us, in this respect. Are we all, young and old, really keeping up our traditional qualities of good manners and politeness, both in our words and in our deeds? To me the reason for this laxity seems to be due to the wrong interpretations of the full meanings of Democracy, of Nationalism and of Independance, which has given to some, the licence to ignore the practising in their daily lives, these inexpensive but most valuable "commodities". To such people, anyone who is punctilious in the observance of the rules of society in regard to good manners and politeness is a Westerner. Why, I just cannot understand. Is it the feeling of such people that good manners and politeness are the monopoly of Westerners?

To me, every INDIAN, man and woman, is a gentleman - is a lady, NOT by mere high birth but because they are INDIANS. It is in their blood to be so. As I have said earlier on the qualities of these are inherent in us but they have to be developed and kept up always to bring greater glory and prestige to our country. "Manners maketh a man" and such men "maketh" a great Nation. The expressions "What a perfect gentleman! - What a perfect lady!" are pregnant with euologies for one so addressed for his or her uprightness of character, of godliness of soul, of good manners, of politeness and courtesy. It is within the reach of every one of us to be so euologised if we want to, and I say, we MUST, to make our Nation greater than it is today.

Our codes of manners and customs in our society have not been unaffected by the impact of Western tradition. I do not for one split second champion the cause of ultra-conservatives who refuse to accept anything new, which might help improve our own ideas, because they wish to preserve their own for ever. This is not right. We must move with the times in this rapidly changing patters of society but in this we should not be slavish apes. Let us make the acceptance of new ideas a genuine synthesis to improve our own indigenous conduct in society.

The words, please, sorry and thank you, do not seem to be in the vocabulary of a good many of us today. These words cost us NOTHING to use, but their use on proper occasions, pays high dividends to win the respect of fellow human beings. Some of us are getting a little too slap-dash, rough and rude and abrupt in our behaviour in public. A busy salesman behind the counter in a shop, or an official occupied with some other work, or an usually harrassed telephone operator at the exchange would not fail to extend prompt and efficient service to one if they find that you are a considerate and polite person who does not get irritated and abusive through impatience. Politeness and consideration for others always pays.

When we talk to each other in company, some of us do talk in an unnecessarily loud voice. Very many of us are not good listeners. We all yabber away at the same time. Some like their own voice and monopolise conversation and become verbal bores. The art of gentle conversation seems to be a thing of the past. Washing dirty linen in publis is not uncommon. A gentleman or a lady does not speak ill of other persons unless they are certain of facts and figures and even if they are, they say to themselves, why speak. What better ways can you think of, to keep friends? It is rather embarrassing to hear people contradicting their elders and their seniors whilst discussing things in public. One can express one's disagreements politely and tactfully without being crude and rude.

I wonder, if watch making industry in India would be profitable, for what use are watches to some when they do not think it quite necessary to be on time for any function private or public - to whom the word punctuality is just a word? To such people, does it matter if the meals cooked for them is getting cold, if many other guests are waiting to meet them, if children are waiting in the sun or rain or cold, if the office staff want some urgent orders on time, if the audience are getting a little impatient by the inordinate delay in commencing a show and so on. To be punctual is act of discipline and consideration for others. Habitual unpunctuality is a social crime - unpardonable. If every one pays a fine of just, one naya paisa for being late, I feel sure we need have NO worries for money for our third five-year plan. Let us have this fine. In mixed parties young people including women stood up whenever elders entered, as a mark of respect. Now this is a rare sight. Some of our young ladies are aping the West and do not get up at all because in Western Society a lady, young or old, is not expected to get up on such occasions. What a tragedy that our own charming young women are giving up our own delightful custom of such grace! Let us please keep up this custom. It was just not done for young people to smoke or sit cross-legged in the presence of one's parents particularly in the presence of one's father. How many keep this up now? One often hears young brats addressing their fathers with their hands in their pockets "Will you have a cigarette Dad?" - frightful!

A gentleman never makes a promise, which he cannot keep and if does make a promise, which he finds, he cannot keep he tells you in time, why he cannot. The worst thing a man can suffer in his public life, is to lose the faith and trust of his fellow beings. A gentleman would never have this, said about him by any one. "Do not believe a word he says - Don't trust him - Have you ever known him keep a promise?".

When one has enjoyed the hospitality of another, be it a stay with him, or taking a meal, it is customary to write to one's host a short note of thanks afterwards. How many of us have the courtesy to do this? It is good manners also to express one's gratitude, either in person or in writing, for any service or act of kindness from others and not take things for granted.

Arrogance, conceit and vulgar display of wealth and power are not the traits of gentlemen. Staying as a guest in the house of a friend, calls for good many acts of correctness on the part of the guest. Arrive on time, conform to the custom of the house in regard to the hours of meals. Dress correctly at all times. Do not accept outside invitations without first consulting your hosts - they may have laid on something for you in the house. How embarrassing it will be for the hosts who may have laid on large party for you and you tell them "I am dining out tonight with my old pal...."? In all these, there should be "May I please" and NOT "I will". I have had experience of this on numerous occasions. It is not done for a guest to discuss one's hosts with the servants of the house. Economy in the use of lights and water by guests in the rooms, they are staying, would be appreciated by their hosts. A word about tipping the servants. The hosts must first be asked if they would permit it, and if they do, give what you want to, to your host or direct to the servants, if the hosts request you to do so. When leaving the room it is but proper to leave it in a tidy state and not with bits of paper thrown about, beds not done up, towels and scraps of paper in the bath room lying about, having used the towels for cleaning one's shoes.

It is gentlemanly and ladylike to be correctly dressed at all times. Sad it is, that there is today laxity in this respect. Slovenly and untidy turnout in public does not command respect of others. One does not have to wear expensively tailored-clothes to look smart. Whether one wears Western style or our own, it must be correct and complete and not half of one and half of the other.

A gentleman driving a car through crowded public thoroughfares, on dusty roads when passing houses or people, past schools and hospitals would automatically slow down. He would stop his car to let women, children, load carrying persons, animal drawn vehicles and old and disabled people, to have the right of way. This is consideration for others. He would not be road hog and ~~hawking~~ hang on to the middle of the road. He would pull up on the left of the road when he stops. It is the height of ill manners to remain seated in public conveyances, such as trams, buses and trains when women and elderly people are left standing for want of seats.

Our fore fathers maintained a certain tradition and a certain standard in their dealings with their fellow beings. They followed, as it were, a style of living, of which they were proud; Western influence has had some impact on all these. While one is free to imbibe influences whether of the West or of the East, one should not be purely imitative. It would be better if one's own genuine way of living is never wholly departed from, as otherwise one is neither fish nor fowl, nor good red herring. Slavish imitation is cheap whereas a genuine synthesis is a praiseworthy effort.

I learnt what little I know and practice in my life, from my dear parents and elders of old. Can we the elders of today with hands on our hearts say, that we are a model to our young people in respect of the subject of this talk - I am afraid not all of us can say it. This is our sacred duty to our children. We must bring them up by advice, by personal example and where necessary by firmness to be the gentlemen and ladies of our land. As Indians by birth they have the qualities of the latter, latent in them all, but they have to be developed. Who else can do this better than ones' parents and school teachers, with elders setting an example.

Many a young man with high academic and professional qualifications has had to step aside to make room for another with slightly lesser qualifications perhaps because the latter had a little more of politeness, good manners, courtesy than the former. Politeness paid this latter.

---

POLITENESS COSTS YOU NOTHING - IT PAYS

WE of today have the matchless joy of being the inheritors of the glories of our ancient civilization, of our ancient culture and our very ways of life. These are all peculiar to us of INDIA. Our Mythologies and the histories of our people are over-flowing with evidence of the qualities of good manners, courtesy and respect for our elders, our Gurus, our women and so on. These are all noble qualities latent in us all, developed in some fully and in others not so fully. Alas! today there are visible signs of these qualities falling off in their standards in some of us. Why?

Since Independence we have been talking of our culture - please permit me to say this - ad nauseum. We seem to live on the glories of the past. Let us all search hearts truthfully and see if we are living upto the legacy left us, in this respect. Are we all, young and old, really keeping up our traditional qualities of good manners and politeness, both in our words and in our deeds? To me the reason for this laxity seems to be due to the wrong interpretations of the full meanings of Democracy, of Nationalism and of Independance, which has given to some, the licence to ignore the practising in their daily lives, these inexpensive but most valuable "commodities". To such people, anyone who is punctilious in the observance of the rules of society in regard to good manners and politeness is a Westerner. Why, I just cannot understand. Is it the feeling of such people that good manners and politeness are the monopoly of Westerners?

To me, every INDIAN, man and woman, is a gentleman - is a lady, NOT by mere high birth but because they are INDIANS. It is in their blood to be so. As I have said earlier on the qualities of these are inherent in us but they have to be developed and kept up always to bring greater glory and prestige to our country. "Manners maketh a man" and such men "maketh" a great Nation. The expressions "What a perfect gentleman! - What a perfect lady!" are pregnant with euologies for one so addressed for his or her uprightness of character, of godliness of soul, of good manners, of politeness and courtesy. It is within the reach of every one of us to be so euologised if we want to, and I say, we MUST, to make our Nation greater than it is today.

Our codes of manners and customs in our society have not been unaffected by the impact of Western tradition. I do not for one split second champion the cause of ultra-conservatives who refuse to accept anything new, which might help improve our own ideas, because they wish to preserve their own for ever. This is not right. We must move with the times in this rapidly changing patters of society but in this we should not be slavish apes. Let us make the acceptance of new ideas a genuine synthesis to improve our own indigenous conduct in society.

The words, please, sorry and thank you, do not seem to be in the vocabulary of a good many of us today. These words cost us NOTHING to use, but their use on proper occasions, pays high dividends to win the respect of fellow human beings. Some of us are getting a little too slap-dash, rough and rude and abrupt in our behaviour in public. A busy salesman behind the counter in a shop, or an official occupied with some other work, or an usually harrassed telephone operator at the exchange would not fail to extend prompt and efficient service to one if they find that you are a considerate and polite person who does not get irritated and abusive through impatience. Politeness and consideration for others always pays.

When we talk to each other in company, some of us do talk in an unnecessarily loud voice. Very many of us are not good listeners. We all yabber away at the same time. Some like their own voice and monopolise conversation and become verbal bores. The art of gentle conversation seems to be a thing of the past. Washing dirty linen in publis is not uncommon. A gentleman or a lady does not speak ill of other persons unless they are certain of facts and figures and even if they are, they say to themselves, why speak. What better ways can you think of, to keep friends? It is rather embarrassing to hear people contradicting their elders and their seniors whilst discussing things